REPORT

OF THE

SCHOOL COMMITTEE

OF THE

Town of Fairhaven,

FOR THE YEAR 1865-6.

NEW BEDFORD:
E. ANTHONY & SONS, PRINTERS, 67 UNION STREET.
1866.

REPORT OF THE SCHOOL COMMITTEE.

To the Inhabitants of the town of Fairhaven:

Every year it becomes the duty of the School Committee of a town to report the condition of the schools under their charge. If, in reviewing the history of the schools of our own town for the past year, we find little of special interest to note, it is gratifying to assure you of their general prosperity, and the uniformly pleasant relations that have existed in them.

Teachers have shown tact in governing, and ability in imparting instruction, while the pupils have yielded a willing and cheerful obedience to the rules of school. Corporal punishment has rarely been resorted to, and no single instance has come to the knowledge of the committee during the past year, of a determined disposition, on the part of any scholar, to disregard the rules or neglect the discipline necessary to the welfare of the schools. As might be expected when good order and correct deportment prevail, the lessons have been learned well and the scholars have made commendable progress in their studies, and the condition of the schools, if not entirely satisfactory, is such as to encourage all who desire or are interested in their continued success to still greater efforts; and the cordial and united efforts of all are required if we would preserve what there is good in them and enhance still further their efficiency and usefulness.

Parents should always remember that the welfare of the schools does not depend altogether on the labors of committees and teachers: their co-operation is also essential; they should encourage punctuality in attendance, inspire confidence in the teachers, discountenance all frivolous complaints against them, and enjoin obedience to their commands. They should visit the schools as often as practicable, and by their presence prove their interest in them.

Among the duties of first importance devolving on committes, is the selection of teachers, requiring ability to decide concerning their literary qualifications, and discernment in judging of character.

In the selection of teachers we would earnestly recommend, in all cases when it can be done, the re-appointment to the same schools of those who have really succeeded well. We are confident that frequent changes of teachers are detrimental to the interests of the schools. This has been observable in our High School, as well as in many of the districts.

The teacher who goes into a strange school for the first time has many preliminaries to learn. He has to become familiar with the names of his pupils, to make himself acquainted with their attainments, before he can arrange them in classes, and what is often much more difficult, he has to learn the disposition and temper of each, and establish his authority as master. He has to overcome the distrust and gain the confidence of the timid, while the mischievous and unruly must test his power to govern before they are sure they may not indulge a little their wayward proclivities. In this way a part of each successive term is little less than wasted in the reconstruction of the school, which after all is too often based on something like a compromise between the half-controlled boys and the doubtfully established authority of the teacher. This is all avoided when the tried and successful teacher returns to his school for another term. He meets the familiar, smiling faces of his former pupils, who greet him with a pleasant welcome, and then quietly take their places in the school-room, unconsciously yielding to an authority which, though it may be absolute, has been so wisely used as scarcely to be felt. An hour or two pass, and teacher and scholars assume their proper positions, the lessons are resumed, and the vacation has proved not a harsh interruption, but a pleasant recreation from study.

Such a teacher naturally receives the aid of parents in maintaining the peace and good order of the school. As a good reputation is a safe barrier against the idle or vicious gossip of the thoughtless or mischievous, so the established character of the good teacher is sure to gain the confidence and cooperation of the parent, and the impatient girl or boy who goes home with a complaint of some fancied grievance, instead of exciting sympathy and creating disturbance, is dismissed with the parental admonition to be a good child and mind the teacher. The grievance is soon forgotten and all goes pleasantly again.

If the village schools of the town possess advantages over those of the rural districts, if their pupils are more advanced in their studies, if there is greater punctuality in attendance, less tardiness and absenteeism, and a better maintained discipline generally, we believe it is due more to the continued employment of the same teachers than to any other cause.

In many districts a semi-annual change of teachers results from the usual custom of appointing a man to teach during the winter, and the erroneous notion that to have a good school the services of a master are requisite.

It is not necessary to discuss the relative merits of male and female teachers, but it is safe to prefer the services of one wholly devoted to the business of teaching, to those of another who only teaches occasionally, to fill up a vacation happening in some more congenial or lucrative occupation.

It will be seen by reference to the appended Table No. 2, that those schools which have been taught the year round by the same teachers have been continued three and four weeks longer, with the same amount of money expended, than those have been which were taught by a man during the winter, and they compare favorably with them in all respects.

We believe these frequent changes are now among the chief hindrances to the progress of the schools where they occur, and if the plan were adopted which men usually pursue in the management of all other business, of securing the best talent obtainable and retaining it as long as practicable, it would result in the greatest benefit.

High School. — Last Fall eleven graduated from the High School; all that remained of an original class of about thirty. The present first class numbers thirteen out of thirty-five who entered the school three years ago. This exhibits about the proportion of those who complete the course of studies prescribed. At least two thirds fail to reach the goal for which they start. Allowing a fair margin for removals and those who unwillingly are compelled to leave school, there must remain a large number who drop off from inability to bear the burden which the duties of the school impose. This would not be if all who are admitted were qualified as they should be. The course of studies is not too severe or extended. It is on the other hand far less so than the standard adopted in many high schools, and not above the legal requirements — and can, with ordinary capacity and common diligence, be gone through with, pleasantly and without detriment to health of body or mind, if the scholar is well instructed in the elementary branches; if he has a good knowledge of these the course would be easy and profitable, without it no amounnt of labor can avail to make up the deficiency; study through all the hours of school not devoted to recitation, followed by study out of school, through the hours which should be devoted to healthful recreation or sleep and rest, will not compensate for this want of due preparation; the burden will grow heavier and heavier, and the lagging pupil, tired, fretting, and nervous, and still looking forward to three or four years of such wearying toil, finally gives up in despair and seeks escape from school and loses forever the benefits.

This will always be so until an inflexible rule is established regulating the admission of candidates to the school.

No child should be admitted who has not reached his thirteenth year, and none should be admitted who, on a careful and fair examination in spelling, geography, English grammar, and arithmetic as far as proportion, fail to obtain an average of seventy-five on a scale of one hundred. Deviation from such a standard may be an indulgence, but not a kindness, and like all unkind indulgences is sure to result in injury to the child.

To these considerations, which we think indicate the real hindrance to the elevation of the character of the High School and its increased usefulness, we ask the attention of parents, and their cooperation in the application of the rule necessary for its removal.

The amount appropriated by the town for school purposes the last year was	$4,500.00
Received from the state fund,	140.22
Unexpended balances for 1864–5,	49.21
	$4,689.43

To District No. 2,	212.00

To District No. 5,	212.00

To District No. 7,	175.00
To High School,	1,400.00
		4,513.00
Balance unappropriated,		$176.43

The subjoined tables will give all needed statistical information, and we close by asking for the same appropriations of money for school purposes which were made last year.

CHARLES DREW, Secretary.
